Interesting Administrative Case

The Supreme Administrative Court ruled that the Director-General of the Fine Arts Department had issued an unlawful administrative decision by designating an area outside the Phimai city wall as part of the Phimai City Ancient Monument. Given that there was no academic or factual justification for imposing land-use restrictions on the said areas inside the city walls, the Court held that such action constituted a disproportionate restriction of constitutional property rights. Accordingly, the Court ordered the suspension of the designation of the areas outside the Phimai city wall as part of the ancient monument.

Alcohol-importing companies argued that being required to display warning labels on their products—such as “Alcohol and beer can cause cancer,” “Alcohol and beer can cause dementia,” and “Alcohol and beer can cause disability”—violated constitutional freedom of trade and occupation and adversely affected their ability to compete fairly in the market. Those companies therefore sought the revocation of such a rule. The Supreme Administrative Court dismissed the case, holding that the warnings merely provide consumers with information about health and social risks. The measure is consistent with the Alcohol Control Act, B.E. 2551 (2008), and does not contravene the Constitution. The court found that the requirement is appropriate to protect consumers and does not affect the essential substance of the plaintiff’s property rights.

A student's attire is a form of identity expression and is protected from discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity. Provided that the attire is formal and complies with university regulations, the Supreme Administrative Court affirmed that students are entitled to wear academic regalia that aligns with their gender identity when attending their commencement ceremony.
